VI 阅读理解

A [2024·浙江台州十校高二期中]

Just by typing a few keywords and waiting a few seconds, a picture comparable to that painted by a human artist appears on the screen.

AI art generators have seemingly swept the Chinese Internet. In some paintings created by AI, an elderly man can be shown as a young animated image, and pets can be turned into adorable cartoon girls or boys.

Huang Ge, an illustrator from Shanghai, said that it usually takes him several hours or days to complete one illustration. But with AI art generators, the efficiency is greatly improved. "Also, the generators have many modification (修改) modes, and the picture can be modified directly in the painting software," he added. Ding Jiao, a comic artist, considers the popularity of AI art generators reasonable as many people who are not good at drawing can create great works through them.

So is the AI painting gradually replacing the human painting? In the hot topic "Using a picture to prove that human artists will never be replaced by AI" online, many netizens uploaded their paintings to prove that humans are better than AI. "Though AI technology has developed rapidly, AI cannot fully replace humans. The warmth and inspiration in human creations are irreplaceable," said Ding Daoshi, an independent analyst.

Another controversial issue is that there is no consensus (共识) of who owns the copyright of AI art. Some users have openly sold their AI paintings and earned money, but it is still a grey area about whether the artwork belongs to users, the digital tool developers or even AI.

Ding Daoshi noted that the various sides should get together to debate the issue and come up with some accepted rules as soon as possible because AI is already penetrating deep into the lives of human beings.

- ( ) 1. Why does the author mention "an elderly man" and "pets" in Paragraph 2?
- A. To show the popularity of AI art generators.
  - B. To illustrate the disadvantage of AI art generators.
  - C. To prove the significance of AI art generators.
  - D. To present the powerful function of AI art generators.

- ( ) 2. What does Paragraph 3 mainly talk about?
- The efficiency of AI art generators.
  - The benefits of AI art generators.
  - The popularity of AI art generators.
  - The functions of AI art generators.
- ( ) 3. What is a controversial issue about the AI painting besides its copyright?
- Whether human artwork will be replaced by AI artwork.
  - Whom AI artwork will really belong to.
  - Whether human artists are better than AI art generators.
  - How the AI painting can play a supportive role.
- ( ) 4. What does the underlined part “a grey area” in Paragraph 5 refer to?
- A done deal.
  - A give-and-take attitude.
  - An ill-defined situation.
  - A hard-to-get game.

B [2024 · 吉林长春东北师大附中高二期中]

A new study suggests classic paintings by well-known Impressionists Joseph Turner and Claude Monet may have been influenced by air pollution during the Industrial Revolution.

Scientists don't know exactly how polluted the cities were during that time for lack of data. However, researchers say that examining the works of Turner and Monet can give a picture of the long-term environmental change with the air pollution.

The study, published in Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences by authors from Harvard and Sorbonne universities, analysed 60 oil paintings by Turner from 1796 to 1850 and 38 paintings by Monet from 1864 to 1901. Scientists successfully measured painters' representation (再现) of nature, focusing on the colours as well as differences in local weather patterns which influenced colouring. They significantly found that paintings created in Britain generally feature a greyer blue sky than works in other parts of Europe.

Researchers particularly believe changes in local sulfur dioxide (二氧化硫) emissions from burning coal may explain changes in the colour contrast and intensity (强度) of Turner's and Monet's works, even after taking into account the artistic trends and subject matter of the time.

Generally, artists can historically accurately represent their environment. Turner and Monet were chosen because they are famous for their landscape and cityscape paintings and also because they were active during the Industrial Revolution, when air pollution grew at a rate never seen before.

Additionally, researchers say that since the air in London was much polluted, the cities would appear grey and dull to the eyes as well as in photographs. By comparing the paintings of Turner and Monet to photos from the era, they were able to determine the painting works were definitely influenced by the change in emissions.

- ( ) 5. What did the researchers find in the works of Turner and Monet?
- Air pollution at that time.
  - Change in subject matter.
  - Social trends of the period.
  - Development of photography.
- ( ) 6. How did the researchers conduct the study?
- By referring to relevant historical records.
  - By examining the colouring of the paintings.
  - By comparing the paintings of Turner's with Monet's.
  - By analysing the data during the Industrial Revolution.
- ( ) 7. What can we learn from the passage?
- European artists preferred landscape paintings.
  - Turner and Monet intended to present pollution.
  - The research focused on studying weather patterns.
  - Britain suffered most from air pollution in Europe.

- ( ) 8. What is the purpose of the text?
- To call on people to protect the environment.
  - To show air pollution in the Industrial Revolution.
  - To inform people of a new discovery in certain artworks.
  - To instruct people to admire classic paintings in new ways.

Museums have been around for centuries, with the first known museum founded in the 3rd century BC. For a long time, they were used to showcase traditional artworks like paintings, sculptures and drawings.

In recent times, however, digital art has started to gain popularity as an art form. This has raised the question of whether or not museums should accept digital art into their collections.

Digital art can be defined as an artwork created by using digital technology and tools like computers, tablets and smart phones. It includes a variety of mediums such as animation, 3D modelling, virtual reality and video game design. Digital art is increasingly being used by artists to create unique pieces that are unlike anything else seen before.

The debate over whether museums should accept digital art into their collections has been ongoing for some time. On the one hand, many believe that digital art is not “real” art and does not deserve to be given the same recognition as traditional artworks. On the other hand, supporters of digital art hold the view that museums should endorse this new form of expression and give it the same respect as any other type of artworks.

The truth is that many museums have already begun to accept digital art into their collections. In fact, some museums have even devoted the entire exhibition to showcasing digital artworks from around the world. This shows that there is a growing appreciation of this type of expression and that it is slowly becoming more accepted by mainstream audiences.

In general, while there may still be some debate over whether or not digital art deserves to be accepted into museum collections, it is clear that many museums are beginning to welcome this new form of expression. As more people realize the digital art and its potential as an artistic medium, it will very likely become even more popular in years to come.

I'm a student at the College of Visual and Performing Arts where we create all kinds of art every day. 1. _____ But I don't think those people truly know the difficulties and struggles in the process of making art.

First of all, we need to be inspired. You may think that's easy. Other times we have a clear idea of what we want but we don't know how to make other people fully understand what we're trying to get at.

3. _____ We need a space to be able to be creative and that can be tricky to acquire. Sometimes we need art supplies or certain equipment and costumes and that can cost money. Even if we do acquire what we need, visions change and mistakes happen so we might not end up using the resources.

The process can take weeks, months, and even years to be fully realized. Once completed, we need to share it and find an audience and provide an environment to display our work. 4. _____ What if nobody likes what we created? What if our vision isn't what we thought though completed?

Creating art is art in itself. It is really not as easy as many people think. 5. _____ It's how we express ourselves and how we communicate with the rest of the world.

Her face is framed by wavy brown hair extensions, her filled lips pursed towards the viewer. It could be a description of an Instagram post, but the touched-up (修改过的) beauty is Diana Cecil, an English noblewoman who belongs to a powerful family at the Jacobean Court. Experts at English Heritage have discovered that the portrait had been altered by some restorer to enhance certain features, suggesting that our modern beauty standards might not be so modern after all.

As the great-grand-daughter of William Cecil, Lord Burghley, one of Elizabeth I's closest advisers, Diana was considered one of the great beauties of her age. Yet it seems that a later artist had other ideas. A restorer, probably in the 19th century, worked on the painting after it was damaged from being rolled sideways. It seems that the restorer also took the opportunity to alter the noblewoman's face, enlarging her lips and lowering her hairline to reduce the size of her forehead.

Now, following careful conservation work, Cecil's original appearance has been restored, with the full-length portrait painted by Cornelius Johnson when Cecil was about 31. The conservation team discovered the changes made to the Johnson painting after removing a yellowing layer of oily liquid that had covered its original, more vivid colours. They also surprisedly found the artist's signature, and a date that had been signed in the portrait's curtain suggesting it was finished in 1634 and not 1638 as previously thought.

According to Alice Tate-Harte, a conservator at English Heritage, it was not uncommon for people to "sweeten" old paintings in the 19th and early 20th centuries. "Conservation wasn't a profession. They weren't working in institutions with salaries," she said. "They were artist restorers and they had a bit more flexibility to prettify and beautify, whereas we have a lot more ethics today. We must keep our retouching to a minimum. I hope I've done Diana justice by removing those additions and presenting her natural face to the world."

both. They create realistic pieces to demonstrate their technical skills and abstract ones to display their creativity.

Frank Mason opened a new art gallery. He intended to use the gallery to showcase the best artworks from local artists, many of whom deserved to be more well-known. He hung a highly detailed landscape by Sheila, his favourite artist. It was valuable as she had disappeared several years ago.

A few years later, Frank had grown his gallery into a business. One cold day, Frank stood at the window and watched the strong winds send snow down the street outside. He noticed a woman standing outside. Snowflakes covered her shoulders. He opened the door and greeted her. The woman shook her head. "I haven't got any money. I just wanted to get out of the snow for a bit." Frank felt bad for her being stuck out in the cold.

"Do you like art?" he asked. "I love art. Unfortunately, I can only afford to visit free galleries." The lady quickly spoke out a few names. Frank was surprised to hear she loved many of the same little-known artists as he did. He would never expect this poor woman to have such a good understanding of art and he noticed the woman's hands trembled severely.

"Don't mind my shivers (颤抖)," she said. "I've struggled to get medication since I lost my home." Frank felt a rush of sympathy. He showed her around the gallery and finally decided to end the tour with his favourite piece. He opened the door to the room that contained his private collection. The woman pointed to the landscape on display. "That's mine," she said. "I painted that."

"What?" Frank was shocked. The woman showed Frank her social security card.

"You're one of my favourite artists. What happened to you?" Frank asked. "I developed Parkinson's disease (帕金森病)," Sheila sighed. "I couldn't paint anymore." Frank offered her a job helping to care for his children and asked her to live with his family in order to cure her disease.
